The Domotz home intelligence product and remote tech support offering sets to get further capabilities as the company acquires Fing, the network scanning mobile device app described as one of the most popular in the world.

Launched back in 2011, the Fing app allows users to quickly scan a network and see all connected devices, evaluate security levels, detect intruders and resolve network issues through a smartphone. The app boasts 12 million downloads and 6 million active users performing over 600000 network scans daily, discovering billions of connected devices every year around the world.

"At Fing, we have always believed in building networking apps that are seamless to use and productive for our users," the developers say. "We are very excited to continue our work together with Domotz on new products and innovations that are even more relevant and loved by our user base."

Post-acquisition the Fing team joins Domotz, where they will continue working on the existing Fing app as well as "new and never seen before" monitoring systems aimed at both home and enterprise markets. The first of such joint products will hit the market on H2 2016.
